Mabardi joins Jones Lang LaSalle as N.E. research manager

July 07, 2011 - Front Section

According to Jones Lang LaSalle (JLL), Lorraine Mabardi has joined the company as the New England research manager. She will direct the research program for the region, and strategically partner with the firm's businesses and clients to track and analyze commercial real estate markets. Mabardi joins JLL after 10 years at Fidelity Investments. Most recently she led the research efforts within the Fidelity Real Estate Group.

"We are thrilled that Lori has joined the team," said Ben Breslau, JLL managing director, Americas research. "Her strategic experience, deep knowledge of commercial real estate, and ability to partner with the business and our clients make her an ideal fit."

Mabardi earned a bachelor of arts degree in Economics from McGill University, and her master of business administration degree from Babson College.

JLL's research team provides unique market insights, comprehensive research products, and customized analysis for corporate tenants, investors, lenders, and developers.

The team leverages extensive proprietary and external sources of economic, demographic, industry, and real estate data to identify trends, forecast conditions, and uncover risks and opportunities in the marketplace.
