Gregory Williamson, BOND's vice president of preconstruction; and Chris Decker, BOND's director of civil infrastructure.

Boston, MA BOND joined officials from Northeastern University and the city of Boston to celebrate the groundbreaking of the new William E. Carter Playground on Columbus Ave. The project is the result of a unique public-private partnership that involves developing an athletic complex and expanded recreation opportunities for city residents and Northeastern students.

Alongside mayor Martin Walsh and Northeastern University president Joseph Aoun, BOND executives and project leaders joined in the festivities marking the beginning of this collaborative project.

BOND is providing preconstruction and construction management services for the Carter Playground project, which is a 6.7 acre site that includes: two multi-purpose turf fields, five tennis courts, inclusive playground and splash pad, passive corner park and streetscape improvements. Additional enhancements include improved infrastructure, such as irrigation and drainage, as well as field lighting and scoreboards. The University will place a temporary air structure—or “bubble”—over one of the playing fields during the winter months to extend the availability of the facility for both students and city residents.

“BOND is proud to partner with Northeastern University and the city of Boston on this exciting project,” said Robert Murray, BOND president. “What we build today will benefit so many children, students and residents for many years to come.”

Project construction is currently underway and slated for completion by end of year 2018. Once completed, the transformed public park will be one of the largest city park/playgrounds in the South

End and Roxbury.
