In 2018, our firm took a huge leap forward with interactive design by embracing virtual reality as a design tool. New 3D design capabilities provide our clients with a better spatial understanding of their project during the design process, and help to save time and money through risk reduction and improved quality control. Five years ago, using BIM as a real-time, modeling tool for 3D renderings was cutting-edge. Today, our clients put on virtual reality goggles and can virtually stand in their new space. This interactive design is light years ahead, and the response from clients has been amazing.
