COVID-19’s impact on the hospitality industry has struck a blow to industries across the world, but perhaps none so badly hit as hospitality and travel. The virus is still uncontained and fragmented government responses as well as uncertainty and fear has led to a near standstill in travel. This widespread fear has led to event and hotel cancellations. With the closure of seasonal outdoor dining in the Boston area, restaurants are faced with shifting business entirely to takeout and delivery. During the summer months, restaurant organizations in the region reported a decline in gross sales ranging from 25% to 75%.

The impact to demand for hospitality is varied even among hotels, air and cruise lines, and restaurants. With both business and leisure travelers having canceled trips and not scheduling any for the near future, hotels and airlines are operating at a fraction of capacity. Restaurants are now shifting to online orders, which had represented only a fraction of order volume prior to COVID-19. These orders have now become the primary revenue driver as business shifts entirely off-premises.

For hospitality workers, the situation is even worse. Those still going to work face a daily threat of sickness and watch firsthand as their workplaces teeter on the brink of collapse.

The 2020 New England Appraisers Expo’s panelists provided current insight into the region’s tourism, events, and hospitality markets as well as a glimpse into the future beyond the current impact of the COVID-19 pandemic.
