What was the most difficult part of working during the pandemic of 2020? Traditionally, the practice of architecture is based on mentoring -- professionals working closely side-by-side learning from each other. Realizing work from home will lead to the potential loss of tacit knowledge, MP established periodic virtual check-ins to make that human connection despite not working in the same physical space. This has allowed us to remain close and stay nimble. Henry Ford said that “Coming together is a beginning, staying together is progress, and working together is success” and I believe, together, this pandemic is going to help us explore new ways and methodologies for creating incredible designs for our clients.
